

Alexa, I want to [slay] a [dragon].

Come away with me now... It is dusk and you are walking into town. You are on your way to the smith to see if he can upgrade your sword. He closes soon, but you think you have just enough time. Suddenly, a scream pierces the silence. A terrified-looking woman runs past you. "Dragon!" she howls. Would you like to investigate or run?

You want nothing to do with any dragon. You turn to run, but just as you ready yourself, a massive green dragon lands on the path in front of you. It turns its head and roars, spewing fire into the sky. Do you want to fight the dragon or run in the other direction?

Dragon? You've always wanted to slay one of those! You keep walking in the direction the woman came from, but you stop when you hear fire roar behind you. You turn to see a massive green dragon razing shops near the entrance of town. Do you want to fight the dragon or run in the other direction?

You try to run but the dragon incinerates you. You are dead. That's sad.

You cast the first spell to come to mind: fire! Unfortunately, it just adds to the destruction. The dragon roars menacingly.

You cast the first spell to come to mind: wind! This just feeds the flames! The large dragon is completely unaffected. The dragon roars menacingly.

You know you can do this. You can slay the dragon. Do you want to cast a spell or use your old sword?

You cast the first spell to come to mind: ice! A wave of ice rushes towards the dragon and its destruction. The dragon is frozen instantly and all the fires go out. Hooray! You have defeated the dragon!

You approach the dragon, swing your sword at the closest part you can reach: its tail. Your sword immediately shatters against it, leaving you holding an empty hilt. You feel panic well up inside you. Do you run or cast a spell instead?

